In her argument about civic participation, the author claims that citizens must remain involved in democracy in order for it to function properly. She uses rhetorical strategies such as ethos, logos, and tone to persuade readers.

The author uses ethos by mentioning historical events and democratic values. These references help show that she understands the topic and give her credibility.

The author also uses logos by explaining how a lack of participation can negatively affect democracy.

The tone of the passage is serious but encouraging. The author warns readers about the consequences of apathy but also suggests that individuals can make a difference.
